ful and swelled my pain. I thought now that Wilde had perhaps wrongly interpreted my words; that he had not understood that I could not be serious; that I had caused him pain. And, like a madman, I started to run after him; at each corner, I sought him with all the strength of my eyes and cried: "Sebastian! Sebastian!" Full speed, I raced through the boulevards until I saw that I had lost him.

Erring through the streets, I returned slowly, and my eyes never left the moon, companionable as a curse.
